

Elevation: A Neglected Emotion in the Realm of Ethics; A Critical Analysis

Masoud Sadeghi *

Abstract

The main issue in the following article is that the main driver of the emotion of elevation cannot be only helpful and exceptional social behavior. Of course, the exceptionality of the driver of the emotion of superiority is not very questionable, and my personal experience and yours also shows that predictable and ordinary behaviors or events do not lead to the stimulation of the feeling of emotion. However, more thought should be given to the issue of socially helpful behavior. The effect of this feeling is not the same in all behavioral areas. the feeling of emotion does not have much effect on justice-seeking or protesting behaviors. In addition, not all people are affected by this feeling to the same extent, and depending on the strength or weakness of their identity or moral sensitivity, this feeling has a different effect on individuals. In summary, based on the findings of the article, it can be said that the stimulus for a sense of emotion is not confined to socially helpful behaviors, and amazing beauties, deep austerities and prayers that are far from showing off, forgiveness of major mistakes, and the like can also be a stimulus for a sense of transcendence.

Keywords

Emotions, feeling of elevation, moral feeling, fear; admiration.

* Associate Professor, Department of Medical Ethics, School of Medicine; Kermanshah University of Medical Sciences, Kermanshah, Iran. | masoud.sadeghi@kums.ac.ir

